

Rhode Island's ten community health centers, in 27 locations throughout the state, have a long history of providing high-quality, low-cost primary health care to Rhode Islanders. Health centers are non-profit, safety-net primary care providers that serve patient populations who otherwise confront financial, geographic, language, and cultural barriers accessing health care services.

Community Health Center Fact Sheet - 2009

In 2009, community health centers served over 120,000 patients in Rhode Island and provided over 500,000 patient visits.

The number of publicly insured and uninsured patients at Rhode Island's community health centers continues to increase, while the number of privately insured patients has decreased slightly since 2007.

Health Center Staff

Rhode Island's community health centers employ over 100 medical and dental providers (doctors, nurse practitioners, physician's assistants, nurse midwives and dentists)

Rhode Island's community health centers employ over 800 staff members, including providers, medical assistants, case managers, dental hygienists and other staff necessary to serve our 120,000 patients.

Staff numbers are for full-time-equivalents, or FTEs; actual number of people employed is higher, as staff members may be part-time (and thus .6 FTE, e.g.).

...in Dental Care

In 2009, the health centers treated over 35,000 adults and children throughout Rhode Island through over 100,000 dental visits including oral examinations, emergency visits, and preventative services. This is a dramatic increase from the capacity in 2003, when the health center dental population was fewer than 10,000 patients. There are 71 dental operatories at the nine health centers that offer dental services. In addition, some community health centers offer mobile dental care to children through school-based programs and the Molar Express van.

...in Electronic Health Records

Eight of Rhode Island's health centers have adopted an electronic health record (EHR). Electronic medical records improve efficiency and clinical outcomes, aid in quality improvement, and streamline resource management.

...in Chronic Care

All community health centers participate in the Rhode Island Chronic Care Collaborative (RICCC), an in-state collaborative effort to promote and support innovative ways to manage patients with chronic illnesses.

Two health center sites are among the thirteen practices participating in the Chronic Care Sustainability Initiative of Rhode Island, a multi-payor initiative with the goal of improving the delivery of primary care services to those with chronic illness through advancing the patient-centered medical home model of care.
